Month in Review - Economic & Market Commentary

With Christmas and 2014 quickly approaching it's a good time to take stock and see how the global economy and the markets are progressing as the year draws to a close. The theme for the year has been strong global share market growth in an environment of weak economic growth, and the question remains of whether the share markets are correct and signalling strong 2014 economic growth or if they have run too hard.

Over the last 12 months global share markets have performed very strongly with the US market (S&P500) up 32.9%, EU market (Dow Jones Eurostoxx) up 26.8%, Japanese markets (Japan TOPIX) up 68.0%, and the Australian markets (ASX200) up 24.2%.

The drivers of this share market performance seem to be the continued improvement of the economies of the US, Europe, Japan, and China. However, growth is slow and results are mixed.

The US growth story has been muddled with the political tug-of-war that was (and continues to be) the debt ceiling negotiations and the ever present soap opera that is the question of whether the US Federal Reserve (US Fed) will taper (or cut) the amount of stimulus that is being pumped into the economy on a monthly basis. In the background business and consumer confidence continues to grow, unemployment is slowly falling, and the US is growing off the back of a low dollar that is leading to a resurgence in manufacturing activity – it's amazing that this can be achieved with all the 'noise' from Congress and the US Fed.

Europe is also starting to show signs of growth, albeit slow growth, with growth contributions from Germany, Spain, and Portugal while France and Italy went the other way over the September quarter. The environment is still very weak with high unemployment, high debt levels, and only slight improvements in business and consumer confidence. It is, however, a start and will allow the Eurozone to focus on rebuilding.

Japanese results have also been mixed with slower growth in the September quarter compared to the June quarter due to slower consumer and business spending and investment. It will be interesting to see if Japan's money-printing program can continue to keep the flame burning and the economy growing.

And China's recently announced reforms are expected to be extremely positive for Chinese growth and are aimed at boosting internal consumption. They include reforms that aim to expand farmers land rights to further encourage urbanisation; loosening the one child policy; encouraging more private investment in state businesses; faster financial and exchange rate deregulation; and more market-determined pricing of oil, water, and electricity. These reforms if implemented will allow market forces to play more of a role in the economy, which is expected to be a positive driver of Chinese growth over the medium term, and will be positive for the price of relatively cheap Chinese shares over the medium term.

Although these major economies are growing slowly global share markets, as leading indicators, are reflecting an expectation of stronger economic growth over the next year. However, looking at some of the difficulties and roadblocks these economies face such as unemployment, debt, and low consumer and business confidence compared to average levels, you can't help to think that the markets have run a little too hard. Only time will tell though and we will continue to watch with interest to see if the market is correct or if a correction is on the cards at some point.
